

Naming Your New Roofing Brand

PREPARED FOR Joe

Because we're building a brand-new business to grow alongside your current one and eventually take over from it, the name has to earn its keep from day one. A new entity starts from zero on Google — new profile, new reviews, new visibility — so the name is one of the few levers working in your favour immediately. Below are three proven naming routes, what each is strongest at, and the direction we'd recommend.

ROUTE A Town-Anchored

Best for winning "roofer near me" and "[your town] roofer" searches

Ilkeston Roofing

Belper Roofing

[Your town] Roofing Co.

Trade-off: matches exactly what most local customers type, so it's the strongest day-one ranking signal — but a single-town name can feel small if the goal is to grow across two counties.

ROUTE B Regional / County

Best for a deliberately regional brand built to scale

Derbyshire & Nottinghamshire Roofing

East Midlands Roofing

Trade-off: looks established and covers a wide area — but county words only help for broad "roofer Derbyshire" searches, which are lower volume. Whoever is physically closest still wins the local map results.

ROUTE C Brandable + "Roofing"

Best long-term brand equity — scales cleanly, never needs another rebrand

Peakline Roofing

Trentside Roofing

Ridgeline Roofing

Trade-off: a memorable name that nods to the area, with the geography handled on the website instead. Slightly less keyword match in the name, but far easier to grow past two counties.

OUR RECOMMENDATION

Given the plan is to outgrow the current business and not be capped, we'd lean toward Route C or a tidied Route B ("Derbyshire & Nottinghamshire", not "& Nottingham"). The word that stays in every option is "Roofing" — we then let dedicated town pages and customer reviews do the geographic heavy lifting, which is what actually decides local rankings.

- One practical must: the new brand needs its own phone number, its own website and ideally its own address, so Google treats it as a genuinely separate business rather than a duplicate of the existing one. This protects both listings.
